Mental healthcare accessibility issues affect most of American society but are especially pronounced in rural areas. Our project seeks to understand the various social systems affecting the relationships between quality/level of access to mental healthcare and residing in rural America, specifically rural Iowa, by examining the following questions:

1) Who gets to have access to mental healthcare and who does not? Why?
2) To what extent were mental healthcare systems intentionally designed to only serve exclusive groups?
3) How does this inequity interact with social patterns and other social systems?
4) How can exposure of these systematic gaps lead to change?
